1. Read the question carefully and understand what is required. Always underline the question! Identify the command word (describe, analyse, evaluate etc) and make sure you know what that means - our website has a glossary. Be clear what the essay needs to be about but also what the constraints or focus of the essay are.

2. Preparatory reading Do not begin an essay until you have enough knowledge at your disposal to support your overall conclusion. Even if you start with a rough conclusion in mind, your reading may require you to change this.

3. Make an essay plan This will also guide your choice of further reading and the gathering of information. What are the main ideas or issues to be covered? What points will lead to your conclusion?

4. Gather information Lecture notes and/or handouts will not give you sufficient information to back up each of the points you are making. Make use of other sources such as books and academic journals. Reputable websites can also be used.

5. Structuring your essay All essays need an introduction, main body and conclusion. The introduction and conclusion should be approximately 10% of your word count each.

Your paragraphs also need a structure: as a general rule remember one point = one paragraph. A typical academic paragraph should follow the PEEL structure: Point (assert something), Evidence (back up your point with references or experience), Explanation (how this helps answer the question), Link to the next paragraph if necessary).

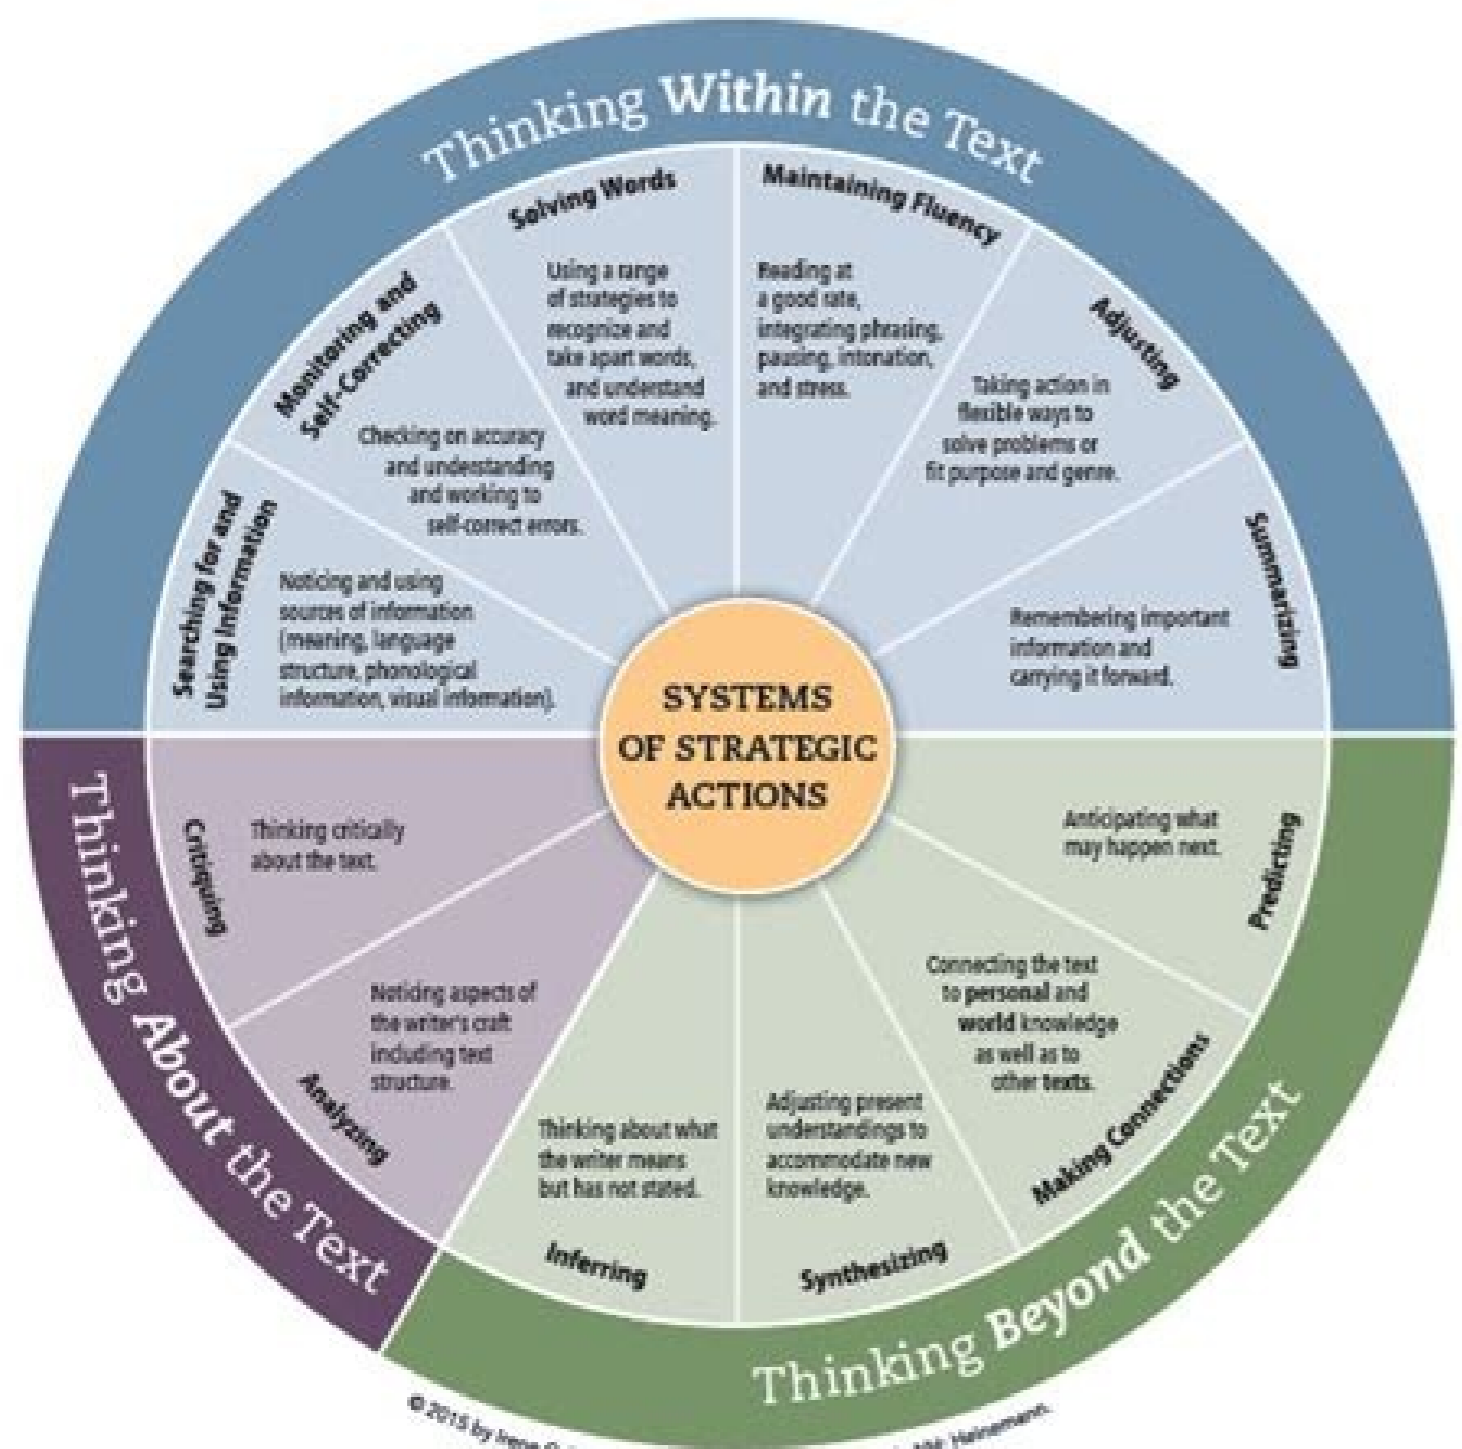

6. Most essays will require you to think critically. It is the explanation/analysis part of your paragraphs that you will gain credit for showing an ability to discuss and analyse the facts and argument you have presented. Make sure every paragraph explains why it is relevant to answering the question or reaching your conclusion.

7. Use academic writing style In essays, you need to write in a formal, clear, cautious and balanced manner. Avoid contractions and only write in the first person (I) if your tutor has said this is acceptable.

8. Sequence your argument This means developing a clear line of thought. Your ideas need to be organised in a sequence meaningful to the reader, and which can be signposted in the introduction. Include signposts throughout your writing to show how your argument is developing: phrases like 'in addition', 'furthermore', 'conversely', 'consequently' etc all help your reader follow your line of reason.

9. Support your argument by citing and referencing your sources Make notes as you read and record works and page numbers or put information into bibliographic software such as Endnote or Refworks so you can refer to them later.

10. Remember your first draft is exactly that! Be prepared to amend, add, expand or adjust parts of it until you are satisfied with the presentation and content. Check for: your content, argument and meaning; referencing; spelling and grammar; punctuation; and style. Are you using appropriate fonts, margins, line spacing etc?

Take a course at the University offers so many chances of writing, you will probably learn academic writing by attending an English-speaking university. If you prefer to be more prepared before diving, you can take a preparatory (introductory) course. Learning to write formally to get everything you know about writing online. Writing for academic purposes means writing formally. What does that look like? Here are some general rules to remember when writing formally: don't use contractions. As the previous sentence shows, instead of writing "do not use jargon or colloquialism. Choose the words that fit your role according to your dictionary definitions, not the way people use them in conversation. For example, if you are using the word "literally," this means "Exactly, without exaggeration", which is the original and correct meaning of the word. Do not use the person's first viewpoint. This just means you shouldn't use personal words like "I" "Nor anything else from your perspective, and let the facts speak for you, instead of saying "I think" "I think." The results of the experiment involve eliminating feelings and sticking to facts. Academic writing is usually not used in academic work. Use words that don't show your feelings about something. For example, instead of saying something is "bad" or "terrible", you might say it is "inadequate" or "poor". Formal writing is crucial for academic writing, as well as for business writing, writing official letters, and many other settings. It's a great idea to learn! 3. Use the Right Grammar Book! Until now, you may have been learning grammar in a classroom, a textbook, or the Internet. Academic writing uses its own set of rules, which combine all the grammatical rules you've learned and standardize them, meaning they make them exactly the same for anyone who uses them. For this, academic writing requires the use of a grammar book. These grammar books cover everything from capitalizing abbreviations to using a comma correctly. They are also very useful for quoting your work, which consists of listing any books, articles, documents or other materials you have used or referred to in your research. The style books most commonly used in formal writing are: APA (American Psychological Association): This style is most commonly used in academic writing and journal articles. It is also used in the field of business and social sciences, which includes psychology, economics and other social writings. MLA (Modern Language Association): This style is most commonly used in the liberal arts and humanities, that is, in any writing that deals with literature and culture. Chicago Manual: This style guide is one of the oldest and most complete guides in existence. It is not used as commonly, but it is more often in business, criminology, history and some other areas. Although APA is the most widely used academic style, it is not always the one used in schools. Different Different Departments and classes may have different requirements, so consult with your instructors about the style to use. 4. Learn by Example! One of the best ways to learn academic writing, besides practicing it, is by reading. Explore some academic works and you will quickly understand how this scripture differs from others. Some examples of academic writing can be found on this web page: Monash University has essays with annotations for a variety of academic topics. JSTOR is a huge database of academic journals on many topics. If you are currently attending college, ask your university librarians if they have free access to the website's library. Questia is another database of journals, which you can access for an introductory price of $1 the first month, perfect for anyone who just wants to take a look at a wide range of writings in a short space of time. Many of the examples you will find above are professional level jobs, so don't worry - worry if you can't understand them! Academic documents at university level can be much simpler. The important thing is to use the correct format and style. 5. Use diagrams and drafts! Half the work of an academic paper is devoted to preparation. Before writing an article, it is a very good idea to plan it first. Many writers of all kinds use schematics. Even the article you're reading right now started as a sketch! Writing an outline gives you the opportunity to plan what you're going to write, organize your thoughts and make sure everything fits together. Think about writing how to build a building. You wouldn't want to start building until you have a plan. Otherwise, your structure might not hold well, and it might even fall down! The appearance of your outline is up to you. As long as I help you organize your newspaper and sense to you, it may even look like a tree if you want. Must be what works for you. For inspiration, take a look at TeacherVision's sample schemes or use Gallaudet Gallaudet Schema template to create your own part. Another important part of writing, especially when writing an article or a report, is writing drafts. A draft is an unfinished version of a final document. Some documents go through many drafts, as writers see what they work and what they don't, apply feedback, edit and review the work. Writing twists can turn a good role into an excellent role. Just look at how different the first and fifth draft of this book Extract! 6. Form and support a solid thesis, each type of academic writing has a thesis. His thesis is the central idea of his writing. The thesis is the statement or the statement he makes in his writing, that the rest of the document will try to prove. Your thesis can be something as simple as "has changed Western society," or it can be something much more complex. A thesis is not the only type of writing that uses a central thesis or idea. It is an important part of any type of academic writing, such as laboratory reports, scientific writing, book reports and many others. No matter what you're writing, you need a main idea to keep the piece... A statement of thesis must be specific and concise (cut and point). Some good examples and tips for writing thesis statements can be found in Kbin and UNC. 7. Get feedback! Chow Do you know what to edit when you're writing your drafts? With the help of others, of course! Many English classes at the university give students the opportunity to review the work of others, which means reading writing for others and suggesting how you can improve. Use feedback from your classmates, teachers or even friends to improve your writing. If you can't find anyone who reads 94 of your first year year year pages, you can receive comments. Use a peer feedback guide This is to find areas of your writing that can be improved. Learning about academic writing, I will do it the easiest things about you when the time comes to really write. Now, get there. ah Practicing!
