Active Shoot has entered the story by reprimanding the parents of the park victims. The Independent article confirmed that 200,000 signatures successfully removed the game. However, shortly after the incident, Valve Corporation, the parent company, recently announced that it will now be on the Steam store. Interestingly, Valve's strict stance makes the Steam Store the first VR platform to feature adult content, as the new policy will undoubtedly open the way for games deemed "pornographic" and "inappropriate." According to the BBC article, Valve believes the move gives the game's creators the freedom to express their creativity to "explore sexuality in a tasteful and heartfelt way." In summary, the parent company is taking a strong position by stating that the games allowed in the store will not reflect Valve's values, but will show their support for each person to create and consume the content they believe they deserve.
