Photo Courtesy: Julia M Cameron/Pexels While other video-conference platforms are also available, Zoom offers more efficient and practical features that make video conferencing simple and convenient. One downside? Photo Courtesy: Chris Montgomery/Unsplash There are video-call situations in which Skype is a better choice than Zoom. It holds up well even in virtual conferences with hundreds of people connected to a single meeting. According to some reports, the number of daily users of Zoom jumped from 10 million to 200 million as people began working from home in the wake of COVID-19. Although many people view Skype as one of the pioneers of free, internet-based video-call programs, it wasn't the first company to offer the services it does. Skype's initial claim to fame was that it was the first chatting platform to offer high-fidelity, voice-over internet protocol (VoIP) service, which essentially made overseas calls free for anyone with a computer and an internet connection. The move essentially migrated Messenger users to Skype, which continued to integrate practical communication features, including Messenger's instant-messaging, file-sharing and screen-sharing capabilities. Even before the global onset of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 when the platform started getting more attention, Zoom shares jumped by 72% on its first day of trading in April 2019, making it one of the more profitable tech IPOs for the year. What Makes Zoom an Appealing Video-Call Platform? Zoom offers many of the same features that are available with Skype and then several extras. The radical changes worldwide in the way we've started working and communicating due to the coronavirus pandemic, however, contributed to the increase in popularity of another video calling app: zoom. For example, Yahoo Chat, which was introduced several years before Skype, also had a video chat feature, albeit at very low resolution. The main demand for zoom is fame that has become synonymous with virtual online videoconferencing, but helps to take a look at the Numbers. Photo Courtesy: Matthew Henry / burst about five years went by³ the Skype login when the current CEO of the company Josh Silverman had developers focus on improving the app's video feature. Since then, Skype has become a standard for online video, voice and chat Communications. in a bit of a match, zoom CEO Eric Yuan founded the company in the same year Microsoft acquired Skype - 2011.
