Many students wonder: can I really learn French? Some do and succeed. Others spend years of learning French independently, but do not feel that they have made great progress and still have difficulty talking to French. During this free French lesson, I will show you exactly how to successfully learn French yourself and when it can be really useful to turn to someone else. Can I learn French? How can I learn French myself? Can I learn French? I will not lie to you: The French self-employed does not work for everyone. I know it's politically wrong to say it. I know that many websites say that "learn French quickly in your unique way". I have been teaching adult French and English for almost 25 years. I have taught many French students and the truth is that when it comes to language learning, not everyone is the same. Some happy French people come easily. Their brains are like a fungus, have their tongues of good "ear" and get along well in French. And some are not so lucky. It is difficult for them to accept the fact that French differs from their language. French pronunciation can be difficult for them. And they have a problem remembering different times of French verbs. So if you can easily learn languages, you can learn French. If you have problems with the French, I recommend using the help of a French teacher online or at least using the proven French learning method to help you in French learning. It leads me to another point. How can I learn French myself? You consider yourself a good candidate to learn French. Happy! There are currently many methods of French learning for independent people. I wrote an article about how to choose the best method of French learning, so I won't talk about it here. If you want to learn French effectively, there are some important tips. An important element of the success of the French tutorial every day is the consequence: I recommend creating a learning program and sticking to it. Do not do it. It is better to study French thirty minutes a day and set an incredible long-term goal than to break up after a few days. Like everything else it works routinely. Many students wonder: can I really learn French? Some people do this and are successful. Others are learning only French but do not feel they have made much progress and are still struggling to carry on a conversation in French. In this free French lesson, I will tell you how you can successfully learn only French, and when it can be useful to communicate with someone else. Can I learn French on my own? How can I learn French? Can I learn French on my own? I won't lie to you: the study of French is not for everyone. I know it's not political correct to say that. I know that many websites will claim to learn French quickly with my unique method. Well, I'm not one of them. I have been teaching French to adults for about 25 years. I have taught many French students and the truth is that when it comes to learning a language, not everyone is the same. For a lucky few, learning French is easy. Their brains look like lips, they have a good "ear" for languages, and they are developing successfully in French. And some people weren't so lucky. It is difficult for them to accept that French is different from their mother tongue. French pronunciation can be difficult for them. And they have trouble remembering the different tenses of French verbs. So if you learn languages easily, you can learn French. If you struggle with French, I suggest you get help online, or at least use a proven method of teaching French to help you with your French research. Which brings me to my next point. How can I learn French? You think you are a good candidate to learn French. You got lucky! Now there are many methods of learning French independently. I wrote an article about how to choose the best method for studying French, so I won't talk about it here. However, if you are only studying to succeed in French, here are some important suggestions. Learn a little French every day. The key to success as an independent study of French is persistence: I recommend creating a curriculum for myself and waiting. Don't overdo it. It is better to learn French thirty minutes a day and keep it up in the long run than to set an unrealistic academic time lens and stop after a few days. As with everything else, a routine begins it's really hard. Keep an eye out for any vacancies. I know that what I say right away will not be particularly popular, but not everything in life can be fun. If you are serious about learning French, it will take work. I hope it's fun, but it can't be fun! Watching funny YouTube movies on YouTube movies or, even worse if you ask me: French lessons on Instagram. It's funny, but is it serious? To learn French, you need to understand the principles of French grammar, but you also need practice. This means that there are exercises, written exercises - passively watching a movie is not enough to learn French. This brings me to my next point: it's important to take a planned, structured approach to learning French. I think teaching French is the biggest risk of teaching French. It's easy to get lost. Some students enjoy a good grammatical challenge and start learning French when they have not yet worked with the approximate French verbs in the language. Other students hate vocabulary lists and collect them but never look at word structure. French language. Others spend hours on YouTube, Instagram, ICT (LOL) and say they are learning French when in reality they are learning nothing. All the work is not done because you are learning French yourself! No need to organize a study program: stick to a proven study program like the one I recommend in my article "How to start learning French". Better yet, choose a proven method and stick to it. Choose the French method that works for you. What is your French goal? Are you learning French to pass the exam? Read French? Speak French? How much time a day can you spend learning French? Before choosing the French method, you need to ask yourself the right questions. Then a little lecture. Here again I recommend reading my article on how to choose the best way to learn French. If you want to read French literature or take regular school exams, you can settle for typical French textbooks. If you want to learn French, who communicates in French all the time (choose words, grammar, verb conjugation), you must have the support of the sound with which you learn. Especially in the beginning, when French pronunciation is still foreign. There is a huge difference between the FrenchThe traditional way of learning (normally formal French and excessive French sound) and French spoken daily in France. If you want to understand French - and yes - I recommend using the French learning method that introduces you to traditional and colloquial French pronunciation and structure of the language. My method suggests, of course: French bilingual novels today are recorded at different speeds and utterances, focusing on contemporary French pronunciation. You should also question the way you learn. Don't count in "official" studies, you should be able to concentrate 100% in French. If you must handle multitasking, choose the "easier" things to learn: if you use my method of learning French, for example, you can repeat dialogues out loud while driving, complete French verbs, or revise French vocabulary. With the "Automodus" option of our free French app. However, I recommend taking the time to study French short writing, complete the written exercises, and learn the most important grammar points. Although I am the author of French methods, I think learning French is one thing - even with the best method, it is "mine"! It has its limits. Let's see why. French is primarily a communication language. Most French students learn to communicate in French in French. To communicate, you need someone to talk to. To be honest, learning French is obviously part of it. Part of that is the social interaction, the ability to overcome their natural fear of speaking up and that they're likely to make mistakes and that's okay. To learn this part of speaking, you need to interact with a real person. Even the best way to learn French "feeds" French: In my French audiobooks, I encourage students to speak out loud, including exercises and Q&A sections. I ask questions, give students time to answer, and then provide answers. But the student never asks me - I mean he can translate the questions I answer him - but it's almost the edge of technology! At some point you have to stop studying alone and really look for a French partner. Conclusion Can I learn French alone? You can probably learn a lot of French yourself. But that doesn't mean you do all the work. Follow the verified curriculum corresponding to your goal. In other words, find a regular methodology for studying the French language 30 minutes 5 times a week, better 2 hours in a row, with 100% care to study the French language-reusable attention is not discouraged. YouTube, Instagram and even French films are funny, but should they be considered a serious time to read French? Maybe sign up for several online courses of the French language to check your French pronunciation, you should finally talk to someone in French in order not only to practice your French language, but also to overcome the fear of speaking and developing confidence in language skills.
