Providing More Jobs

More schooling will provide more jobs. If the government decides that pre-school is a requirement for children, there will automatically be an increase in the need for teachers. The increase in the number of classrooms will mean more jobs for the unemployed. "Good child care depends on having enough qualified people to provide care for children. And the younger children are, the more staff is necessary to give them individual attention, and therefore proper care" (NAEYC, 1997 pg. 1). Paid helpers are also a necessity. A teacher cannot run a classroom by herself. Helpers can come in and be paid for their services. "There is no agreement about what level of training or experiential proficiency is necessary to work as a lead teacher or teacher assistant with preschool-aged children" (Stegelin, 1992, pg. 37).

Some may think that pre-school is pointless because a daycare can serve the same purpose. These people are mistaken. If you run a daycare you do not have to have a teaching degree. If you teach a pre-school you still need a degree. "Some states offer an early childhood education license that is separate and distinctive from an elementary license" (Stein, 1991, pg. 3). Pre-schools will provide more jobs for qualified teachers and also help act as a daycare for parents.

Pre-school can act as a free Daycare

People should be taking advantage of pre-school. It is much cheaper to send your child to a school and get proper care than to send them to a daycare and have them sit around and watch TV all day. Daycares are needed because many women are getting out into the workforce (Stegelin, 1992, pg. 3). But sometimes parents just need to get out and get things done. Pre-school will act as that few hour get away from their children. And while the parent is out, the child is starting to get an education. "Most working parents use one or more of the following choices: home care by a family member, care in another's home, care in or through the worksite, center-based and school-based care" (Lubeck, 1990, pg. 3). School-based care is the most effective choice.

An Early Start to Learning

It is evident that the more schooling a child receives, the easier they will reach their potential. There are certain "critical points" where children learn best. If they start school in a pre-school setting, they will be able to adequately develop these skills.
