Setting Boundaries on Technology

Technology has provided humans with an easier way of living. Computers, automobiles, televisions, radios, telephones, and airplanes are a few examples on how technology has contributed to making our lifestyle an easier and more comfortable place to live in. Scientific research has made a tremendous breakthrough with the different cures for diseases. These technological advances have saved and improved lives. Although there are positive aspects of technology that are beneficial to society there are negative aspects as well. Take for instance, being able to clone someone is something critics will say is immoral. Being able to clone is an example of technology advancements never thought possible, but help us to realize that the possibilities of scientific knowledge are endless. Depending on the discoveries and mishaps that occur with trial and error, critics are quick to judge scientific research. There are many pros and cons for technological advances. But the question is, should there be boundaries that set limits as to how much knowledge should be acquired?

Since scientific advancement has opened many doors to our future, it has enabled us to communicate to one another across country, fly to any part of the world, and visit the moon in a spaceship. Through medical advancements, technology has expanded to allow a more comfortable living. It has helped find cures for diseases. Some critics argue that technological research has brighten our world with so many inventions and such that it would be shameful to want to continue our search to find more. For instance, J. Michael Bishop states, " Resistance to science is born of fear. Fear in turn, is bred by ignorance. And it is ignorance that is o...
